And thought of the one she had long sine lost, And said, as her teardrops back she forced,

"I hate the wind in the chimney." Over the chimney the night wind sang And chanted a melody no one knew; And the children said, as they closer drew, " I'lls some witch that is cleaving the black night through-'Tis a fairy that just then blew, And we fear the wind in the chimney.'

Over the chimney the night wind sang And chanted a melody no one knew; and the man, as he sat on his hearth below, Baid to himself, it will surely snow, And fuel is dear and wages low-And I'll stop the leak in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night wind sang And chanted a melody no one knew; But the poet listened and smiled, for he Was man and woman and child-all three, And he said, "It is God's own harmony, The wind that sings in the chimney.'

HIS OWN DAUGHTER.

Dear mother, it is the best thing after all, that could have happened; it is so much better than anything I dared to hope for. Because, it I had not fallen and sprained my ankle, I would not have lost my place in the store, and if it hadn't been for losing my place there, I would never have gone all over the city hunting another situation, and if I had not been to so many places, and-if starvation had not stared us in the face, I would never have done so desperate a thing, and we would still be trying to keep soul and body together on the poor-paid, health-destroying labor-a poor saleswoman's wages."

"Tell me all about it, dear." And Mrs. Smith dropped her thin, tired hands on the work over which she had bent wearily all day.

away, mother. These poor, dear hands may rest a little now, for I am going to get ten dollars a week, and will only hand on her own, saying, as he did so: be away from you four or five hours each day. I shall have time for ever so much sewing besides, and you can just rest and grow strong once more. I received my first week's wages in advance. See here-" and she cut the cord that bound a large bundle, and out on the table rolled several smaller parcels. "I brought the money home in a shape we could appreciate best; at least-all there was left after paying the baker. Now, mother dear I am going to be extravagant and make an extra good cup of

"I know, mother," broke in the blithe voice, "but, you see I havn't forgotten that it is nearly noon, and we have had no breakfast yet. There now -giving the fire a vigorous poke that set the tea to steeping. "You see mother, I was just discouraged; I had been to every store, millinery and dressestablishment I knew of, and received the same answer: 'No more help needed,' to all my inquiries, and, as I said, I was desperate. Just as I turned the corner of Bleeker street, I saw a man being helped out of his carriage; such a splendid carriage, mother. He was not a very old man, but looked as though he was almost gone with consumption. I went straight up to him, hardly realizing what I was doing, and asked him if he knew where I could get employment of some kind. At first he looked angry, as though he thought my impudence uncearable, and when he saw my face he stood still and looked at me as though he had seen a ghost. After a moment he said:

"Yes, I will engage you to come to my house every day at ten o'clock and or write for me, as I desire, till three. I will pay you ten dollars a week for your services."

"Then he handed me his card, on which I read, Hon. C. Hewitt, No. 42 Leonard street, and I remember that one of the girls had once pointed out his beautiful residence to me."

"If the situation and terms are satisfactory, you will please accept one week's wages in advance, and come tomorrow at ten."

"And he laid out the money, which I was only too glad to take."

"Were you not a little hasty, daughter?" ssked the mother, anxiously. "You know nothing of this man."

"I know this, mother, we were starying, and that money was our only saivation; besides it all occurred so quickly that I hardly realized what had happened. Somehow it seemed as though some overruling providence was guiding me in spite of myself."

"God grant it may be so," said her

And now, while Nellie and her mother are enjoying their dinner, let us cast a hasty glance into Mrs. Smith's past life. Her parents having died when she was young, her childhood and girlhood were pered in the dreary monotony of mind, but he finally stammered or her as ht's home; a dome which was "Will you-will you wander down life grudeligly offered her; where food, clotting and Mand flon were dealt out dess of love sings siren songs to us? Of to her, but where never a word or look of love was bestowed upon her.

What wonder that, when Claude the little cottage.

Then followed weeks of happiness for the young girl whose life had been so General weskness and nervous debili-lonely, until one evening her husband ty cured by Day's Kidney Pad.

came to her with a troubled look, and told her that his only relative, an uncle in England, was very sick, and had sent for him to come immediately, and taking his young wife in his arms, he soothed her with fond words, saying:

"I dare not take you with me, darling. Uncle George was very angry when my mother married an American with such a plebian name. Of all low names, Smith, he claims, stands at the very bottom. Uncle George never forgave mother; but when both my parents died, leaving me alone, he appointed a guardian for me, and kept me well supplied with funds, and now that he is dying, I must go to him; but I will return as soon as possible to my little wife .'

And so he left her with plenty of money, but with an aching heart, and she had never seen him since.

Troubles had seemed to multiply after that. A contagious disease broke out in their town, and carried off whole families. Her aunt fell a victim, but she escaped and came to the city, hoping to find employment by which to support herself. She had a small sum of money left, with which she purchased a little cottage, and here Nellie was born.

The roses bloomed once more in Nel lie's cheeks, and her step grew light as the weeks advanced. She liked here . ployment, and above all, she liked her employer. Many substantial evidenc s of his kindness had found their way to the little cottage, and many an extra or inversely, perhaps more, or somedollar had found its way to Nellie's thing less, as the case may be, and still pocket.

As his face grew thinner and his step slower, he seemed to turn to the young if not always, as already described, girl for sympathy, and the sound of her sweet voice, or the touch of her cool hand, had power to soothe him to rest ful." when all else had failed. He often watched her as she moved about the room, in her bright cheerful way, with "First let me put this endless sewing a strange wistful look in his fading eyes. One morning as she took her seat by his couch, he laid his thin, transparent

> "I feel that I have but a few more hours of life, and I wish to talk with you," and he smiled almost sadly as he met her startled glance.

"Yes," he continued, slowly, "I shall soon be gone, and there will be no one to truly mourn for me, unless, it be the little girl I have taken such an unaccountable interest in. You will miss me, Nellie?"

For answer she bowed her head upon her clasped hands, and wept.

He waited a few moments, then taking one little palm in his hands and caressing it tenderly ke said:

"No doubt that you have often won dered that I, a perfect stranger, should have given you employment without question or reference. I can hardly tell why I did so myself. Perhaps it was a look on that pitiful young face so like a dear face I used to love. I have carried the memory of that face all through life. I had only been married a iew weeks when I was summoned to England, and when I returned 1 found the house where I had left my dear one deserted, but was told that she wa

"My uncle, at his death, left me his property, providing I would take his name, but oh! it has been a long, sad life without my darling.

"I have taken a strange interest in you, child and my heart seems to cling to you in my last hours. I have taken care of your future, my dear, and there is neither wife nor child, brother or sixter, to question the right of the will that I have made in your behalf. Somehow, ever since I have carried out my intentions respecting you, I feel so peaceful; as though there was nothing leit undone, and I am ready to go."

He was interrupted by a fit of coughing which lasted so long that Nellie was frightened. After she had laid him back on his pillow, she saw his lips move, but the words were so low that she had to bend over him to hear them.

"When I am gone, Nellie, open this little ebony casket. Inside you will find my wife's picture. You may look at it, but I want it buried with me."

He lay back on his Lillow and closed his eyes, wearily. A strange calm stole over his features, and an icy chill crept into the hands clasping hers - a chill that sent a thrill of horror to her heart. She bent over him and spoke hinname, oh! so tenderly-but he heard not the young voice. He had passed forever beyond its reach. The next day, as he lay in his coffic Nellie opened the casket and took out the picture he had treasured. Going to the window, she opened the care and looked upon the sweet, girlish face smiling up at her. One moment, then a quick, gasping cry escaped her it is, and she fell into the arms of an attent ant. The face of her friend's lost wife was the face of her own mother.

How a Mine is Worked.

"I wish you would tell me all abou the way men get gold and silver out of a mine, my dear," said a lady in Brooklyn the other evening to her husband, as he peeled of his coat and sat down in three chairs for the evening. "I always thought they first bored in to the ground with a pay streak until they found the shaft, and then they drifted for the assessment, and when they found that they just put a blast in the indications and salted the dump. Now it seems that you don't do that way. You follow up the micacious slate until you strike the biasiold. Then you see if you can find a color that matches the copper stained trilobites, that you prospect and you"

"No, I must stop you there. You are getting a little off the vein. You probably have the right idea, but you are using terms that are not correct. After they get the wall rock on the dump and pinch out the night shift, they salt the contract and blast out the vertical chilblain. Then they drift for the blossom rock, baled hay and poverty till they strike the varicose vein. After that it is a short job to put on the blas-fold and sample the stockholders. #### Judge Hopper.

There used to be in Queen Anne's County, Maryland, in the days of Judge Hopper, of cherished memory, an old offender, whose name is forgotten, but who, for the purpose of this story, shall be called Kildee. This person was, court after court, brought before Judge Hopper, charged with fighting somebody or breaking the peace in some way. The Judge fined him until he got tired and finally told Kildee that if he was ever brought before him again he would send him to jail. Kildee assured the judge that he would be peaceable in the future. But when the next term came Kildee was there charged with assault and battery. Judge Hopper, vexed and indignant, reminded Kildee of his charge only six months before, and asked him what palliation he could show for breaking a promise made in open court. "Yes, Judge," said Kildee," "I remember it all, and I expect you, Judge, but the way of it was this: promise you that I wouldn't fight any me everything he could lay his tongue to come at twelve and cat for one?"

to. I stood it all, Judge, for I remember what you told me and what I told you, and I said to him he wouldn't abuse me in that way if I hadn't promised Judge Hopper not to fight any more. He then commenced to cuss and abused you, Judge, and I couldn't stand that. I lit on him and licked him quick- think he's just grand, massive, superb' er than lightning. I am willing to go to jail, Judge, but if I have to spend half of my time there, no man shall cuss Judge Hopper when I'm around, and go off with it." Kildee's sentence was a very short one. When about twelve years old said Mr. Geisman, of the Globe Chop House to our representative, I met with an accident with a horse, by which my skull was fractured, and ever since I have suffered with the most excruciating rheumatic pains. Of late I applied St. Jacobs Oil which has given me almost total relief.

An Aged Tree.

For the last three thousand years, it is said, there has stood in the immediate neighborhood of Sparta a gigantic cypress, the very same tree which of old found mention in the pages of Pausanias and other antique Greek historians. It reared its stately head to a height of one hundred and sixty feet above the ground, and its dark foliage overshadowed a space nearly three hundred feet in circumference. It was a source of profit, as well as of pride, to all the inhabitants of Sparta, for its world-wide fame annually attracted hundreds of curious tourists from all parts of Europe, whose temporary sojourn in its vicinity brought no small amount of grist to the Spartan mill. Only a short time ago this venerable sylvan patriarch was ignited by a band of gypsies while cooking their midday meal under the shade of its leafy branches, and burned to the ground despite strenuous efforts made to save it from annihilation. It would appear that grievious accident is regarded by the Greek populace as of evil omen to the enterprise in which the Hellenic nation is just now embarked.

Life Insurance.

Hon, W. V. Lucas, Auditor of State of Iowa, in the 12th Annual Report, Insurance Department year 1881, says: The value of Life Insurance is recognized by all classes and professions of people. The avidity with which people seek life insurance in cheap companies proof enough of the proposition. All kinds of organizations have assumed to furnish insurance upon human life. As a rule all new systems and plans should be critically examined before money is paid to zealcus agents and unscrupulous managers.

Perhaps no business furnishes more oop-holes through which rogues escape the penalty for swindling than does the business of life insurance. In saving this I do not mean to be understood as saying that all plans of that business are open to the charge. The Companies that have been long engaged in the business, upon strictly business principles, have won the confidence of the public. When the laws of Iowa regulating life insurance are faithfully complied with in letter and spirit, there can be no sort of doubt as to the security of policy holders."

The Centennial Mutual Life Association has complied with the law of Iowa in letter and spirit, and offers to persons whose prudence suggests the necessity of providing for their families, the safest and also the cheapest mode of doing so.
